Josephine Stiles' unbridled tongue estranged her from her wealthy father. Sent alone to the Territory of New Mexico, after rejecting his fifth (society's best?) choice of a husband, she repents but abhors surrender. Operating an inherited store, the lumber, canvas, and sod abode horrifies and is never called "home." Unsavory characters irk, tinny music irritates, and determination rises "to get away from that awful saloon!" Outspoken suffragette, contempt of men and ridicule of their ways also estranged her from love. She'd never even felt love, no reaction, no butterflies, no nothing. Father's decree (only a husband inherits) never slows her success near the goldfields. To adopt three orphans, a bashful and in-love rancher shares her spaciouly built home in name only. Since maternal love comes natural, she's complete, until his nephew discovers love when only fourteen. Smothering propriety, she's obsessively driven to discern why romantic love eludes her.
